

With the “sword of Special Prosecutor Robert Mueller” hanging over his head (and he seemed not bothered with it), President Donald Trump delivered his second State of the Union Address last Tuesday evening.

He described the state of the U.S. as strong.

What was noteworthy in the audience were the numerous women wearing white; mostly new members of the House of Representatives.

Currently, there are 127 females serving in both houses of U.S. Congress.

One hundred two in the House of Representatives, and 25 in the Senate.

Majority of those women are Democrats serving as representatives of their respective districts around the country.

Those women Democrats were easily visible during the President's State of the Union because they were wearing white.

According to reports, they were wearing white as a sign of unity and to call the attention of Mr. Trump that he should not deviate from measures affecting women.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi played the role of a symphony conductor, signaling her flock when to stand up and when to sit down.

She even introduced a style of clapping (see photo below) described by a comedian as an "obscenity invention without the use of a finger."
